The country has a lot to look forward to, in terms of economic recovery and better times for growth. Boom times for cities. Growing industries. A healthy infrastructure. An easing of long-term uncertainties. It's a long list of how Scotland is punching above its weight, and perhaps that will serve the rest of the UK well as we move into Brexit negotiations. The country's cumulative economic growth since 1975 is around 8%, far higher than the UK as a whole. A decade of uninterrupted growth is the new reality. If you want to make a list of what's in the future for Scotland, you should probably start with a long list of jobs and apprenticeships. In the 12 months since the Brexit vote, the number of apprenticeships in Scotland has risen by 12%. Flexible communities A report by the Institute for Fiscal Studies concluded that the impact of the referendum decision to leave the EU was overwhelmingly bad for the UK as a whole, but it was also a step forward for Scotland. The analysis suggests that four of the eight areas which are likely to experience the fastest improvements in the UK over the coming years are all in Scotland. This week I'm on a trip to Iceland. Every time a plane leaves Reykjavik, and on every flight approaching the capital from this cold place, you get stunning views of the distant coastline. I hope that one day, Scotland's interest rate will give us similar views.
